Food industry can say goodbye to logistical nightmares

Manufacturers have an exciting new option if they're looking to reach leading retailers, restaurants and food distributors. Schreiber Logistics is a new player in the redistribution business, relieving the pain of managing the end-to-end supply chain.

Schreiber Foods has built an unbeatable network that moves more than 2 billion pounds of refrigerated product to its U.S. retail, food service and contract manufacturing customers each year. Now it's able to offer those same efficiencies to others in the food industry – from big-box distributors to mom-and-pop family operations, and everything in between.

Introducing Schreiber Logistics: schreiberlogistics.com. How does it work? By consolidating deliveries. When manufacturers add their product to Schreiber's trucks, they'll get the benefit of Schreiber's massive scale and speed.

"What makes us unique is our product is on the truck, too," said Jeremy Koskey, Director of Schreiber Logistics. "That means we're going to do everything we can to ensure on-time, in-full deliveries."

When other manufacturers come along for the ride, they'll get:

- Improved service. Schreiber Logistics gets product there fresher, quicker and more often on its 1,500 outbound lanes going to customers every week, if not multiple times a day.
- Reduced costs. Manufacturers pay lower transportation costs and significantly lower penalties.
- New markets. Schreiber's national network of more than 600 of the world's leading retail and food service customers gives other manufacturers the opportunity to grow.

"We partner with others in the food industry to find customized supply chain solutions to meet their needs," Jeremy said. "Our end-to-end supply chain solution lets them focus on manufacturing and sales, while we worry about managing their supply chain. Whether it's working to reduce working capital, reach new markets, or reduce transportation and warehouse spend, we have a solution to make it happen."
